

Trying Not To Wake Him

by J N MacNeill

Trying Not To Wake Her given a sex change

Too soon to start the day; I turn in bed.
I'm trying not to wake him. I won't get to sleep; my mind won't stop. And so I'd better keep a cheerful topic in my head.

My put-down to the politicians' rhetoric
will do the trick; I polish it again, and cap it with some salty wit.

But now I'm standing in the dock, and yet
I can't recall the charge. The smarmy little prosecutor paints a damning scene.
I want to know how good her view had been.
Then "I will ask the questions" comes the gritted-teeth reply. "Well, ask! That's all I mean."
The judge instructs me not to intervene.

Too tired to start the day, I must unwind.
Still trying not to wake him. I can't get to sleep; my thoughts won't rest. And so I'd better keep a pleasant focus in my mind.

If I were left alone I'd be upset
— of course — but in a while, I do confess,
I'd want someone to share some cosiness,
to be in tune, to play a sweet duet.

With unromantic frankness, no finesse,
I tell him he could always choose the song,
and I would be most pleased to sing along.
Assuming he decides to answer yes.

I dwell on intros that we might perform;

then slide my hand to nestle somewhere warm.